

Schools must consult with their communities about the health education programme

The most recent statement from the Ministry of Education on schools consulting their communities is in Sexuality education: A guide for principals, boards of trustees (2015).

Although the document is specific to sexuality education, the section on consultation applies to ALL aspects of health education.

The Board of Trustees must consult with the school's community only in health education (see Section 60B of the Education Act). Consultation is a board responsibility, but the consultation process may be delegated to leaders and teachers with specialist knowledge.

In summary, the board must:

- Consult with parents of enrolled students (plus proprietors of state-integrated schools).
Include any other person that the board considers is part of the school community.
- Prepare a draft statement on the delivery of health education
- Complete a consultation process at least once every two years
- Decide upon, plan and facilitate a method of consultation that it considers will
  - Explain the content of health education;
  - Learn the community wishes of health education (taken in good faith, an account of feedback, but not negotiation or agreement where community wishes contradict education policy); and
  - Determine the health education needs of the students.
- Consider any comments received on the draft.
- Following consultation, adopt a statement for the delivery of health education.

There is no one way of doing this, but a consultation needs more than just provision of information.

It is important to engage with Māori, Pasifika, Asian, and other communities so all students are understood and provided for. Include parent-teacher associations, whānau, hapū, iwi, and aiga support groups, church groups, and school committees, and consider venues for in-person meetings.
